TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 14.

ASLEEP IN A STREET CAR.—In one corner of a crowded street-car crossing the Sixth street bridge on Saturday evening sat a young lady of more than ordinary good looks. Her fellow-passengers had plenty of opportunities to gaze at her without embarrassing her, for before the car was over the bridge she had dropped sound asleep. The conductor evidently knew her, for he made no attempt to wake her, after collecting the rest of the fares. She did indeed look very pretty; her head resting slightly against the window-frame, her lips just parted and her face composed peacefully. There was a half smile on her face, too, as if her dreams were pleasant. She had probably been standing behind a dry-goods counter all day long. The men, and the women, too, were careful not to touch even the hem of the sleeping girl's dress as they passed out one by one from the car. By the time the car had crossed the Allegheny Parks only the sleeper and a gentleman, who was reading a paper, were left in the car. Just then the conductor entered the car and remarked to the gentleman: "I shall have to wake her; she gets off here." The conductor laid his hand on the sleeping girl's shoulder and gave her the least possible bit of a shake, while with the other hand he rang the bell for the driver to stop the car. The girl arose at once; but though she did this, and opened her eyes, she was evidently still in a dream. Her lips moved and she said in a whisper, "There, it's 10 o'clock; did you hear the clock strike? Let me go, I say—please let me go, Charlie?" and then she suddenly stopped, put her hands to her face, and without a word more ran out of the car—wide awake and blushing like anything.—Pittsburg Dispatch.
